Rebel Against It!

The much discussed neutrality act, which has been the subject of so much hot air and controversy is circles perhaps our best obstacle against us as a country. The American people have strong feelings about neutrality, and it is appropriate that we accept it with more than the usual amount of respect.

We must not forget that this is a time when the American people have the power to make decisions about our neutrality. The president has the power to declare war, but only the American people can decide whether or not to declare war.

The American people have the power to decide whether we will remain neutral or whether we will enter the war. We must not forget that our neutrality is only as strong as our determination to remain neutral.

The American people have the power to decide whether we will go to war or stay out.
We must not forget that our neutrality is only as strong as our determination to remain neutral.

The American people have the power to decide whether we will go to war or stay out.
We must not forget that our neutrality is only as strong as our determination to remain neutral.

Letters to the Editor of the Voice

Comment on War, Sections, Cheers

Dear Editor,

I was interested in your statement that we should work for the best interests of our country, and that this means working for peace and neutrality.

I think that we should all work for peace and neutrality, but I do not think that this means that we should not work for our own country.

I think that we should work for our own country and for the best interests of the American people, and that we should also work for peace and neutrality.

Sincerely,

Dear Editor,

I think that the president's statement
is not correct. I believe that we should work for our own country and for the best interests of the American people.

I think that we should work for our own country
and for the best interests of the American people, and that we should also work for peace and
neutrality.

Sincerely,
