Dunham Favors Immediate U.S. Entry Into War

Says Britain Would Allow 'Major Allies' to Land Early, Based on Economic Viewpoint

Prof. Allen Dulles of the history department made a new essay into this second war in America, in the course of which he emphasized the critical role of the British statesman. The British were not only the last line of defense, but they also were the only ones who would have the strength to make a difference in the long run. The essay was delivered at the University of London and was widely applauded.

Favors Presidential Pledge to International Law, He says, which the forces of the American World Alliance today, as he was in their going over, as the key to the question of international support and the way to defeat the Axis.

In answer to the question as to whether the American forces would be able to advance against the Axis, he said that Britain has a large number of forces in the Mediterranean, which would be decisive.

Dulles denied the possibility that the United States could be divided. He said that the forces of the American World Alliance today are decisive.
